The cavalry has now a demand made upon it by Regulation which, although it can be met on the drillground, will be impossible of fulfilment in war. It will therefore be necessary to discard in war what we have taken such pains to learn, a thing which frequently happens in manoeuvres, and even on the exerciseground. In the formation for attack and the deployment, the Regulations follow the logical sequence of their point of view that, in the attack upon cavalry, no second line is necessary, and in this matter adhere to, the directions laid down in the old Regulations. From my point of The principles laid down for action against cavalry can be applied, mutatis mutandis, in the matters of pursuit, melee, and rally. Such attacks are carried out in accordance with the principles of para, 113. The strength of a regiment renders it impossible to attack the objective in several lines. The officer commanding will give orders as to whether the front line is to be in single rank, and as to whether the rear lines are to be in a similar formation or in closed double rank. In attacking infantry, the lines must not be at too great a distance from one another. In attacking artillery, the distance between lines is determined by the effective area of the burst of shrapnel (300 metres = 330...
