Brand New Book  Print on Demand .Excerpt from The Central Course of the Nervus Octavus and Its Influence on Motility After so many admirable researches as have been made of late about the mode of distribution of the N. octavus in the central nervous system, after all that has been brought to our knowledge from competent investigators, as to the influence exerted by this nerve on the muscular system in animals and in man, it may be considered an almost preposterous enterprise to publish another treatise, and moreover a monography, on the eighth cerebral nerve. We may not expect - at least not if no new methods are employed - that we will find much to be added to what has been taught us by Ewald about the troubles of motion, observed in pigeons whose labyrinths have been removed on one or on both sides. Our knowledge of the function of the octavus-system has been settled for a long time by this eminent experimental essay. Such is also the case with our anatomical notions. The investigations of Held, of van Gehuchten, of von Monakow, Lewandowsky and others form likewise in a certain sense a finished whole, accordant in many leading features. These researches have shown the distribution of the Nervus octavus in the central system to be much more complicated than was surmised before. Still, though the whole appears thus complicated, the differences of opinion on cardinal points have diminished. Our knowledge having reached this stage, I am perfectly conscious of the impossibility that quite new views should be offered by this monography, in which the anatomy and the physiology of the nervus VIII are not studied by means of new methods. Yet...
