Still, however much may be said in excuse for their cowardice, and, however we may admire, and should study to imitate the apostle's general bearing towards those who had forsaken him in his danger, we ought not to fail to note carefully the circumstances which give it aggravation, and we may find much material for profitable thought, and much motive for self-examination, and much cause, it may be, for Belfreproach, as we contemplate the facts presented by our text. Paul the aged, Paul the prisoner, standing alone, deserted by those who were pledged by the bonds of a common faith, we might almost say of a common nature, to the rallying round the apostle, and sharing, if they could not ward off his danger. Such is the picture. We ask you--we...
