Excerpt: . . . the white clouds were high up in the heavens; now, the road was bordered by rich brown woods, and hedges coloured with the solemn grandeur of autumn, and the clouds hung so low that they seemed almost to rest upon the highest tree-tops. The kittens that had peeped and scuffled in the stable-loft, were now growing into fine cats, and both lay quietly asleep in the afternoon sun. Again the rattle of wheels was heard upon the road, and presently a one-horse fly could be seen coming along between the russet hedges. As it drew nearer, Sam recognised it as the vehicle that was kept at the railway station, six miles away, for the benefit of the few passengers who alighted there. This shabby conveyance stopped at the inn door, and out of it got a gentleman in a fashionable shooting suit. Landlord and...
