Excerpt: . the process induction; we call the established fact an induction, as, for instance, the fact widely collected analogies, (e. g. as in Paley s Natural Theology,) in order to place some consequent assertion beyond the possibility of disbelief, or of reasonable doubt, the general assertion or inductive fact being also called an induction. Mr. Whewell says, (Mechanical Euclid, page 173,) that in this process some notion is superinduced upon the observed facts. I am not quite sure whether, by this, I am to understand the first interpretation we give to the facts, and which leads to experiment, or to the collecting of analogical facts, in order to confirm it, or set it aside, --and whether he calls this an induction: Or, whether he means, as I do, the application of that enlarged knowledge which is the consequence of experiment, or of collected analogical facts, to the unexperimented, or uncollected phenomena that always remain. I must also confess I have some difficulty with the answer he makes to the following question, in the first volume of the History of the Inductive Sciences: (Chap. III., Sect. 2, 2, page 79,) What was the radical and fatal defect in the speculations of the Greek philosophical schools? The answer given is this: That defect was, that though they had in their possession that z, y c, s, are bitter. Such a tact, be it observed, is always different from a constituted general fact: it...
